This is a common fault in brick masonry that needs particularly to be guarded against in chimney construction. Portland cement mortar in the proportions of one measure of cement to three measures of sand will, if it is not robbed of its moisture, become harder than the chimney bricks, which it unites into one solid shaft of masonry. Such a chimney is an anchor to a wooden frame and not a pile of bricks to be supported by the frame. Protection Thousands of dwelling house fires have proved the of Woodwork necessity of safeguards about stoves, ranges, furnaces, and other containers of fire. These structural precautions are explained in municipal building ordinances and in the publi cations of the National Board of Fire Underwriters. They cannot be enforced in the country for a lack of state laws for this purpose, and they have been very little regarded there. This is evidenced by the fact that the chances for fire are greater in the country than in the congested areas of cities. The following section, No. 47, from Dwelling Houses (see page 43) is an example of the precautionary measures which experience has proved necessary for reasonable safety from fire. They are quite as applicable to the farmhouse as to the city dwelling. 1. No furnace, boiler, kitchen range, stove, or any other heating appliance shall be placed less than three...
